Utilizing diversion of circumstance, character, and language, Shakespeare shows a clever analysis on Elizabethan culture, for example, the distinctive social classes and cliché sexual orientation jobs. Shakespeare effectively achieves this using pixies, for example, Oberon and Titania, Bottom as a comic character, just as the cliché Hermia. The utilization of parody in his plays helped Shakespeare to remark on Elizabethan culture.

In Shakespeare's well known play A Midsummer Night's Dream, the presentation of the Great Chain of Being empowers Shakespeare to remark on the social classes during Elizabethan culture. 'What thou see'st when thou dost wake/Do it for thy genuine romance take/Love and mull for the wellbeing of he/Be it ounce or feline or bear/Pard or pig with bristled hair/In thy eye that will claim/When thou wak'st, it is thy dear/Wake when some disgusting thing it close' (II.ii.679 - 686). This is the spell Oberon articulates while crushing the fluid from a charmed blossom onto Titania's eyelids. Oberon's refrain is comprised of rhyming couplets in versifying tetrameter. In A Midsummer Night's Dream, the pixies regularly talk in this meter instead of the more common predictable rhyming of the mechanicals. This abstract gadget proposes that regardless of whether the pixies are not set anyplace in what Elizabethan individuals accepted to maintain everything in control, they are still viewed as higher up than the Mechanicals in the Great Chain of Being. The utilization of silliness of circumstance in that line wa comedic to the Elizabethan culture as the mechanicals were attempting to fit into the higher class. '[Snout] O Bottom, thou workmanship changed! What do I see on thee?/[Bottom] What do you see?/You see your very own ass leader, isn't that right?/[Quince] Bless thee, Bottom; favour thee. Thou craftsmanship interpreted' (III.i. 930 - 940). Tumult and dread quickly happens after Puck does magic that replaces Bottom's human head for that of a donkey. This play-inside a-play expresses the way that Bottom's 'interpretation' is a lone physical transformation in the play, mirroring the numerous changes that occur in Ovid's Metamorphoses, a Latin lyric that Shakespeare was intensely affected by while composing A Midsummer Night's Dream. Despite the fact that the change is implying old style folklore, Bottom's transformation results from pixie enchantment. Diversion of language assumes a major job in this line as Shakespeare has deliberately made a quip. This scholarly gadget permits Bottom and the mechanicals to be mocked as the lower class and be made as a prototype character in the play. Shakespeare uses malapropism in the line 'Quince: Marry, our play is the most sad parody and most savage passing of Pyramus and Thisbe'(II.ii. 9 - 10). Shakespeare's motivation of this procedure was to make jokes about the manner in which the Mechanicals are talking. This proposes the lower classes are not accomplished to the ones above them in the Great Chain of Being. Also, the utilization of this play on words sets up the way that the mechanicals were attempting to seem like the higher class. Cliché sex jobs given to ladies in Elizabethan culture we commonly how they must be loyal and well - mannered. Be that as it may, using basic in the line 'I do beg your beauty to excuse me/I know not by what power I am made strong/Nor how it might concern my unobtrusiveness/In such a nearness here to argue my considerations,/But I entreat your elegance that I may know/The most terrible that may come to pass for me for this situation,/If I will not marry Demetrius' (I.i.58 - 64), Hermia's self-assuredness challenges the sex jobs as she is insubordinate against her own dad. This likewise challenges the desires for the Great Chain of Being as it was a method for looking after request.
