Nelson Mandela And Mahatma Gandhi’s Non-violence Resistance Strategies

I believe that there are many ways to practice non-violent resistance. Although, I think in Nelson Mandela and Mahatma Gandhi’s situations three practices worked the best and were the most successful for them and the people they were protesting for, which were boycotts and strikes which is economic pressure for whom they are going against. Another way I thought worked good was civil disobedience, I felt it was a very peaceful way of showing non-violent resistance. By accepting jail time for Nelson and Gandhi it did well for both of their protests.

The most effective form of resistance was economic pressure which includes boycotts and strikes and other protests of that sort. One of the ways that Gandhi practiced economic pressure was the Dharasana salt works, it was a protest that Gandhi formed against salt tax, their goal was to get the salt from their land for free since it was their land. What started with about 50 people increased to nearly 2,500 people. They were able to get some of the salt while keeping in mind it was one of the hugest salt works in India at the time although when they military came they came at the protesters with automatic violent force, with Gandhi’s authority powers all protesters were able to remain non-violent. Another one of Gandhi’s strategies was to call a general hartal on the country. Hartal was traditionally a day of fasting and practicing religion while the people were “supposed” to be at work. This non-violent strategy angered government because almost everybody was participating and they couldn’t do much about it since it was nonviolent and legal. Angering people would help towards getting government out of India which was their end goal. Mandela’s go-slow strike is another way of economic pressure shown in the nonviolent way hey practiced it, instead of a hunger strike Mandela wanted to do a sanction which is an action taken by a government to limit investment and trade with South Africa in order to exert pressure to change. These were significant because it was somewhat of a warning to both governments in these situations to let them know that the people were going to fight back and not for a short amount of time and it was going to be hard to stop. The people of South Africa and India were mostly thrilled to start protesting what they believe in and not being shut down right away.

Moral pressure also plays another big roll in showing their ways of nonviolent resistance this was basically exercising ways of civil disobedience. Gandhi showed this by sending a letter to the English governor, Lord Irwin in India. In the letter, he clearly expressed how it was unfair to the Indian people that the English are aloud to hold taxes for the resources that should belong to them. He later held The Salt March where no were harmed but the Indian protestors were which is also another example of the unfair treating. Even the Indian police had to go against their people and were forced to brutally beat the Indians that dared to go against what they didn't believe in. Mandela concurs with Gandhi's method for fighting saying 'It was the best technique.' and he respected Gandhi's method for harmony and dissent. Mandela gained from Gandhi this is the best since it requires no brutality or uproars. The English had no clue how to react to individuals simply resisting them without physical power. Gandhi ensured that everyone comprehended what he was attempting to do. In complete quiet, Gandhi's men drew up and ended 100 yards from the stockade encompassing the Dharasana Salt Works. Unexpectedly, at an expression of direction, scores of local police hurried upon the propelling marchers and came down blows on their heads with their take clubs. None of the marchers lifted their hands to protect any blows. This affected the individuals of South Africa and India in light of the fact that the English, in the long run, drew off for both Gandhi and Mandela. Thusly was additionally the most serene method for fight. It was better than different techniques and Mandela concurred that he should move toward comparable issues with similar strategies. It didn't require savagery and the English had no other method to react other than more brutality or giving up to Gandhi's and the individuals' desires.

The final way nonviolent resistance was shown was by accepting jail time and in some ways asking for it verbally. He required volunteers for the 'Resistance of Shameful Laws battle'. This was to fight out of line laws and necessities. He disclosed to the volunteers that it is troublesome and they could be detained or assaulted yet regardless, no reprisal. This is him and his kin tolerating prison time for the penance of their nation. Gandhi got word that a few adherents of his have submitted an offense. They had been detained and Gandhi had no wavering in going along with them. He expressed 'If these men have submitted an offense, I had submitted a more noteworthy offense and I, subsequently, requested that the Judge force upon me the heaviest punishment. Gandhi was giving up his prosperity for something he actually didn't do. Despite the fact that Gandhi didn't perpetrate wrongdoing, he felt as he did in light of the fact that his adherents were condemned to a quarter of a year in jail with hard work. Gandhi is additionally indicating that regardless of what the English do, he and his adherents will consistently be fighting opportunity. In (Doc H), Mandela says 'Walter, Govan, and I educated insight that whatever sentences are gotten, even capital punishment, we would not advance. Our choices dazed our legal counselors. Mandela was happy to make the penance of detainment even demise, for his kin. Mandela dreaded nothing realizing that he was doing all in his capacity to make it right. Mandela's message was 'No penance was excessively incredible in the battle of opportunity'. This affected South Africa and India enormously in light of the fact that it simply made the individuals need to fight more. When a pioneer like Gandhi or Mandela is placed in jail, the individuals tailing them are offended. This gives them more inspiration to dissent and reclaims their opportunity. This is on the grounds that it shows the inspiration driving both of these men and that nothing else to them matters other than opportunity.

The three best kinds of nonviolent resistance strategies are boycotts and strikes as economic pressure, practicing civil disobedience, and tolerating prison time. These are the best methods for fighting since they constrained the English to discharge hang on India and South Africa. Monetary weight, moral weight, and tolerating prison time all mean various things, however, they contribute pretty similarly. Financial weight undermined the English the most on the grounds that it took a chance with their economy and imports/trades. Numerous strikes and blacklists were held to dissent. This was the best and contributed such a great amount to the opportunity of the individuals.
