Proliferation Of Rape Culture In College Campuses

I decided to write my research paper on rape culture with an emphasis on rape culture and college campuses. But I am first defining how rape culture is typically limited. Rape Culture can be looked at as an atmosphere in which rape is accepted, and also sexual violence upon women is normalized and overlooked in the media and popular culture. Rape culture is continued by the use of misogynistic speech, the objectification of women's bodies, and the glamorizing of sexual brutality, through forming a culture that dismisses women's rights and security.

The general issue with rape culture affects every woman. Most women and girls restrict their behavior due to the existence of rape, especially on college campuses. While most women and girls exist in fear of the chance of being raped, it rarely crosses a man's mind. This, in turn, is how rape acts as strong medians by which the whole female population is contained in a subservient standing to the entire male community, even though many men reportedly do not like the concept of rape, many women are still victims of rape.

Moving into a college campus must be an exciting time for recent high school graduates. College is filled with gatherings, revitalizing freedom away from parents, and having the opportunity of being within proximity to students of similar age. Nevertheless, each of these possibilities helps to promote a gendered environment. With the use of media applications such as Tinder and other online introduction applications, which features are responsible for strangers hooking up and why college settings are divided continuously and exploit women. Tinder is an application that helps strangers match with others based on a short biography and photo of people nearby. Tinder has become widespread among colleges and universities. Apps similar to Tinder is used among men to increase their sexual conquest numbers. After the encounter, the male partner begins to brag while the female partner is shammed. This incident is an example of a sexual dual-standard that currently subsists in culture but is usually apparent in our young and university community. Having different guidelines concerning sexual confrontations between males and females is mimicked even more when sexual assault cases include witnesses recording videos of the incident.

Gender inequalities can be seen in fraternity parties. There is a structure of party life at colleges that also creates a magnified gendered culture. Before, a girl walks through the front door that is automatically treated differently. Typically at parties, Men are charged for an entrance fee, whereas women are encouraged to enter free of charge. This is to ensure that women are not deterred from joining the party and encourages them to stay. Also, most parties do not charge women for drinks. When the drinks are free, the more women consume and the better of a chance the men have of taking advantage of them. The free entrance and drinks give men expectations of sexual courtesies. Because men have to pay the party entrance fee and alcohol, their expectations are higher. This type of intercommunication and sexual expectation among college males and females at parties constructs a gendered environment. The women are primarily seen as prey and the men as hunters. The party structure enhances rape culture by assuming that women who drink automatically want to have sex.

It is noted that one in four women will become a victim of sexual assault while attending college.

That number is growing higher. Most people are worried about a strange raping them, when 9 out of 10 times, the rapist is someone the women know. Generally, the victim will not feel comfortable talking about the incident, and even if they are, it would be to a friend and not an actual officer.

School culture can throw off numerous adolescent men and women on what establishes sexual assault. First-year College students experience a transformation in their lives when leaving home for the first time. This unique encounter is defined living in coed dormitories, near-constant socializing that includes alcohol beverages typically. Socialization into this new environment can mix-up what sexual assault can be or was never explained in the first place. A quick reminder of what sexual assault is classified as. Sexual assault is any sexual contact that occurs without consent. Falling under the definition of sexual assault are sexual activities such as forced sexual intercourse, forcible sodomy, child molestation, incest, fondling, and attempted rape.

Since many individuals are unaware of the true definition of sexual assault, it goes exceptionally underreported in college. While some women are under the impression if there was no intercourse or because they were drinking, it does not count as sexual assault. However, any undesired or unwanted sexual behavior is interpreted as sexual assault. The most significant amount of victims of rape can identify their offenders. Party culture of college creates a more significant probability of getting party raped.

Universities, particularly more significant institutions, create an expectation of partying is a necessary step to receive all college has to offer. Cultural expectations that are partying and drinking help develop social bonds. Because young men and women want to create these bonds, they drink more than they can handle. While intoxicated, women display to be more defenseless to sexual assault. When this happens, the male attendees utilize their loss of control to elicit non-consensual sex. Regrettably, rather than scrutinizing male's actions, the victim is usually accused of the consequence. Alcohol consumption represents a role in the endurance of sexual assault of university females. However, there is a cultural double standard regarding drunkenness. If the rapist was intoxicated, it decreases his liability, but if the victim was drunk, it increases her accountability. In our current patriarchal society observes intoxicated women as comfortable and wanting sex. The bulk of sexual assaults on college campuses occur at college parties where copious amounts of binge drinking and the use of drugs are frequent. This frees up sufficient possibility for acquaintance rape. Intoxication can lead to victims declining to march ahead out of horror, or needing confirmation due to having no memory of the occurrence. College rapes are absolutely not a new issue. Although alcohol is a determinant associated with acquaintance rape, it is a crime solely driven by power control. The intoxication aspect makes it more accessible for rapists to dominate their victims. This is why college parties that include heavy drinking are creating more opportunities for rapes to occur. Since fraternities are typically focused on masculinity more than anything else, this suggests that they are regularly trying to establish their manliness to everyone, including themselves. When evaluating a pledge's capability to communicate with girls is a way to determine if they have what it takes to make the fraternity proud and masculine.

Fraternities are always focused on commitment to their team a. Members are expected to be endlessly dedicated to their newfound brothers. This type of proposed privacy and security produces a disconnection from members and non-members. Being in this family means confirmed club protection generates a more convenient possibility to get away with sexual assault. Fraternity men frequently use alcohol as a defense against sexual assault allegations. Overall, Rape has a consant appearance on college campuses and will continue to until we all realize there is a problem and stop victim blaming entirely.
