Its system of government was democratic. The capitalist bloc opposed Soviet Union and Warsaw Pact during the Cold War.

Costa Rica:

I choose the regime change attempt of Costa Rica because it was one of the most affecting crisis of Costa Rica and caused a civil war due to political chaos and international actors.

Costa Rica is recognized as Latin America’s oldest and most stable uninterrupted democracy. Ruled by a presidential government, for over fifty years, after the Civil War of 1948, the country has experienced democratic elections with widespread popular participation, and regular revolution of rulers and parties. Thirteen elections have taken place since the civil war. According to different survey studies, seventy-seven per cent of Costa Ricans believe that democracy is preferable to any other kind of government.

Forrest Colburn has grounds to describe Costa Rica as ‘arguably the region’s most successful democracy.

The 1940s were a period or significant disorder and savagery, prompting a regime collapse and a revolutionary group in 1948. Different factors, for example, Jose Figueres Ferrer's conviction that fighting was the best way to end the eight-year regime, just as the position taken by international actors (particularly the U.S. Government) and the weakness of the military, included the fundamental components for the political emergency to form into a civil war. The Costa Rican Civil War of 1948 was the characterizing occasion of the twentieth century for Costa Rica. The political scene of 1940s was overwhelmed by a man named Rafael Angel Calderón, who would turn into the leader of Costa Rica from 1940 to 1944. Rafael was an influential man who needed to clutch power, yet could'nt. After 1944 he was unavoidably ineligible to run the framework until 1948. He bolstered President Teodoro Picado. The Picado's time saw not very many changes. It was thought he was the manikin of Calderón and his supporters so he could take over in 1948. The forty four day civil war began when President Picado had to discharge the military onto the overall population on various occasions to look after request. Figueres' campaign was fuelled with a rising mainstream turmoil that described Costa Rica all through the 1948 discretionary procedure, particularly after the invalidation of the political decision. Figueres' development profited by the position taken by the U. S. government, as well as by the shortcoming of the Costa Rican armed force. As far as the global impact in the emergency, one focal factor reinforcing the 'progressive' development was the position taken by the American Embassy. When the Cold War was gathering force, the United States was not happy with the impact accomplished by the Left in the Costa Rican government. The U.S. took a few activities so as to dispense with this impact and forestall Costa Rica from turning into 'the Czechoslovakia of the Western Hemisphere.' Firstly, they chose to designate Nathaniel Davis as the new American Ambassador in the nation. Mr. Davis came to San José from the U. S. International safe haven in Moscow and was viewed as a specialist on Communism. Davis received a vivaciously against socialist stance, threatening to Picado's legislature and great for the resistance. Besides, the Department of State requested that Nicaraguan tyrant, Anastasio Somoza, stop his obstruction in Costa Rica's inner undertakings. Somoza had chosen, with Picado's endorsement, to send his Guardia Nacional (National Guard) into Costa Rica so as to secure the fringe between the two nations and bolster the legislature. The Nicaraguan despot had grounds to fear a potential triumph of the progressive development, as it was sensible to accept that with Figueres in power his system would be the following objective of the Legión Caribe. At long last, the United States not just knew and did nothing to discourage the military guide got by the ELN, yet additionally hindered the Costa Rican government's endeavors to secure military arrangements. As clarified by Teodoro Picado in a letter imparting his acquiescence of the administration to Mora and Calderón, 'incontestable powers are totally resolved to cause us to lose the battle.'55 It is difficult to deny that the U.S.A. was glad to make room for a progressive development looking to unseat an alliance government with radical cooperation. On its weakness and its powerlessness to get weapons because of the American barricade, the administration powers were partitioned into three particular gatherings. One gathering, designated the Unidad Móvil (Mobile Unit), reacted to Picado's requests, the common police was faithful to Calderón, and those known as the Brigadas de Choque (Hit Brigades) or the 'linieros' were driven by Manuel Mora and the Communist Party. It was this last gathering, for the most part coordinated by banana estate laborers, that introduced the best protection from Figueres' ELN. Moreover, there is proof that the legislature didn't completely confide in the furnished Left. Mora's allegations in regards to Picado's reluctance to gracefully them with weapons were affirmed when the ELN caught weapons still in their unique boxes put away in different government quarters. The shortcoming and interior division among the administration's military ought to be thought about, not just as a factor that facilitated the ELN triumph, yet in addition as a component that may have persuaded Figueres to begin his campaign in any case.

As indicated, following a month and a half of fighting the ELN expelled the government. This denoted the finish of the eight-year regime. The losing alliance effectively arranged the protection of their social changes. Simultaneously, the PUN supporters needed Ulate to be pronounced president without a moment's delay, dreading a Figueres tyranny. Besides, PSD individuals were prepared to exploit the war's result and anxious to get into office and begin actualizing their social popularity based venture. This general after war vulnerability reached a conclusion when Figueres and Ulate marked an agreement in 1948. It selected Figueres to head an accepted Governing Junta for in any event eighteen months, and expressed that a while later Ulate would expect office. After eighteen months, subsequent to having required a Constituent Assembly commanded mostly by PUN members, Figueres kept his assertion. The fact that Figueres signed and regarded the agreement when he had total military control of the nation shows the veracity of his equitable standards, yet in addition the importance of other logical elements and political weights that clearly impacted his choice. Among them one finds: the coherent logical inconsistency of directing a tyranny in the wake of professing to battle to protect majority rules system, the way that a large portion of his supporters were without a doubt Ulate's devotees (they had decided in favor of him in the 1948 political race and were later enrolled by the ELN to battle against the extortion), and political weights from the U.S.

requesting that Figueres not proceed with the Legión Caribe's arrangement to dispose of different autocracies in the locale. Surrendering capacity to Ulate would have been a vital move not to include Costa Rica in this undertaking. Regardless, at that point the nation introduced all the fixings required for the foundation of a military tyranny. This, be that as it may, didn't occur. In actuality, one of the most significant equitable points of reference of Costa Rica's political history was settled when the triumphant applicant of the 1948 political race expected office in 1949. This made the way for a progression of changes that made the institutional structure required for the union of majority rules system in Costa Rica.
